Research. Expert comment on a study of online restaurant reviews by Verena Schoenmüller and colleagues.

Do other researchers in this field agree with her findings? "It's an excellent, comprehensive study from one of the most respected professors in the field", says Nikolaos Korfiatis, a professor of business analytics at the Norwich Business School of the University of East Anglia (UK). He has similar research interests, though he was not part of Schoenmüller's study. And he points to a factor that has rarely been investigated up to now: the impact of the time that lies between the purchase and the review. "People tend to give a better rating to experiences, such as eating in a restaurant or reading a book, if more time has elapsed before rating them", says Korfiatis. "This could also be a reason for the more positive assessments by the group who were able to choose what they rated".
